Choosing between close matches

- An RFP naming a system the buyer's own customers use — patients, constituents, members, students — usually wants an Industry Solutions offering rather than a generic custom application.
- “Reporting is slow / our numbers disagree” points to Enterprise Data Warehouse when the organization needs one governed source of truth; to Business Intelligence & Dashboards when the warehouse already exists and the gap is the front end; to Data Integration & Pipelines when the ask is moving data rather than analysing it.
- “Connect our systems” points to Enterprise Systems Integration for internal workflows, and to API Development & Management when the buyer wants reusable, governed APIs for internal or partner developers.
- “Replace our old system” points to Legacy Application Modernization when the existing system must keep running through the transition, and to Custom Web Application Platform for a clean-sheet build.
- An RFP mostly about running software that already exists points to Application Managed Services; one mostly about assessment and hardening points to Security & Compliance Services.
- A large RFP can legitimately span two offerings. Lead with the primary one and present the second as a named, separately priced workstream.
